

"TV Mind-Control"

Activist Artist Nathan Janes Introduces Pupaganda.com with Release of Painting and Article

Nathan Janes has announced the release of his latest original painting titled, "TV Mind-Control" to celebrate the unveiling of the new website Pupaganda.com. The website features several of Janes' works, which explore prominent social issues of today while employing the family dog as muse. Each painting throughout Janes' website will be paired with an article written by Janes that further explores the issues introduced through his works of art. Janes' latest piece examines the role of television in American culture; the painting depicts a Weimaraner, which appears to be hypnotized by an old-fashioned television airing a "stand-by" screen in the background. After much study of the subject, Janes has written an expansive article, which provides information about the control of television programming and how it can be used to control the viewer. Janes says that he sees himself as an activist as well as an artist and that the new website serves as an important tool in communicating messages he hopes will affect awareness in those who view his art.

###

Biography of Nathan Janes and his activist art sent upon request.

Nathan Janes      www.PUPAGANDA.com      Press@pupaganda.com      419.341.0846